Excerpt: .in life and death alike, --that, since he lives and reigns, no final and irremediable evil, no evil that is not in some way ordained to work at last for good, can possibly befall us. According to the second of the two principal ancient attempts to account for the origin of evil, all suffering of whatever nature is directly inflicted by the hand of God, as a retribution for sin. This was the belief of the Jews in early times. The idea of Satan as the great author of mischief was of comparatively late origin among them; it was partly borrowed from the Persians, and did not attain its full development until shortly before the time of Christ. In the view that chiefly prevailed the deluge was a divine judgment upon a wicked and perverse generation; the Babylonish captivity was a punishment for Israel...
